Abstract:
The distribution of points within a point cloud often has a shape, and we would like to study it using homology. However, a point cloud is a discrete set of points and so it has no interesting homological features. In this talk I will describe the method by Gunnar Carlson, called persistent homology, in which we build a series of simplicial complexes from a point cloud and study the shape of the distribution of points using homology.