This project will seek to answer a number of questions pertaining to the occupation of Bois Island, Newfoundland. Working within the theoretical framework of household archaeology, artifacts and contemporary documentation associated with the officers’ barracks will be examined to provide insight into the daily life of individuals stationed on the island in the mid-18th century. The result will be compared with other contemporary military sites to determine how representative the military life on Bois Island is of the period and location.